Veterinarians who see avian patients should be able to identify common species of pet birds (cockatoos, Amazon parrots, macaws, conures, etc) and be familiar with normal species-specific behaviors. For example, parrots of Pionus spp often make rapid sniffing noises when stressed that can be mistaken for respiratory distress.

Laboratory animals People often disagree as to whether they think animal experiments are necessary, useful or justified, and to what extent non-animal alternatives are available. We believe that every area of animal use should be judged individually and that replacing the use of animals with humane alternatives must be the principal goal.

Mice and rats are not as common as pets as other rodents. They are used extensively in research and, consequently, a separate section on mice and rats as laboratory animals follows below (see Mice and Rats as Laboratory Animals). Although a great deal of information has been accumulated on wild and laboratory rodents, very little of this information pertains to pet rodents.
