Metaphor and Thought. Ortony, Andrew, Ed. In the essays contained in this volume, philosophers, psychologists, linguists, and educators raise questions about the viability of the traditional distinction between the literal and the metaphorical. The essays reflect important parallel developments in the fields represented but also illustrate a convergence of approaches to a common problem by different disciplines.

The con- structivist approach seems to entail an important role for metaphor in both language and thought , but it also tends to undermine the distinction be- tween the metaphorical and literal. Because, for the constructivist, mean- ing has to be constructed rather than directly perceived, the meaning of nonliteral uses of language does not constitute a special problem .

In classical theories of language, metaphor was seen as a matter of language, not thought. Metaphorical expressions were assumed to be mutually exclusive with the realm of ordinary everyday language: everyday language had no metaphor, and metaphor used mechanisms outside the realm of everyday conventional language.

According to conceptual metaphor theory, individuals are thought to understand or express abstract concepts by using referents in the physical world—right and left for moral and immoral, for example. In this research, we used a modified Stroop paradigm to explore how abstract moral concepts are metaphorically translated onto physical referents in Chinese culture using the Chinese language.
